History

Proving that the best things in life are worth waiting for, it has taken five generations of manufacturing experience to achieve the design and construction excellence for which Falcon is renowned today.

The original Kitchener

Falcon's manufacturing heritage can be traced back to 1830, when the first range cooker, the Kitchener, was produced at the site of Falcon's current headquarters in Royal Leamington Spa. Designed and built by William Flavel, the son of Falcon's founding family, the Kitchener heralded a breakthrough in domestic chores, and was the first cast iron cooker that could boil, roast, bake and warm – all from the same heat source. Its time-saving, easy-to-use functionality was quickly embraced by all the most important households across Europe, including the royal households of Queen Victoria, Edward VII, the King of Italy and the Emperor of Germany – all had Kitchener stoves. Between 1857 - 1859, a total of 39 Kitcheners were ordered for export to Melbourne, Australia. As to why Melbourne was the only export destination overseas ordering in large quantities, was perhaps that many English people had settled in the region and the climate there was temperate, unlike other parts of Australia.

Following the death of William Flavel in 1844, his son Sydney Flavel inherited the firm and the reign of the Kitchener continued, picking up several prestigious awards for manufacturing excellence over the next half century. Following the First World War, developments in gas and electricity paved the way for a new breed of range cookers, with the then cutting edge Kitchener used as the blueprint for cast iron technology by Falcon's sister company AGA.

Indeed many of the developments of today's range cooker technologies – including the first colour shaded ranges, dual fuel ranges and fold away grills – have their origins in the research and development laboratories of Royal Leamington

Spa. Now the home of the entire Falcon collection, the historic site has recently undergone a major investment program, to ensure that the next generation of kitchen appliances from Falcon are as groundbreaking and innovative as the original Kitchener, first created there 178 years ago.
